A memorandum on Ministry of Education Circular 6/63

1. Introduction

The Minister of Education in 1961 requested the National Advisory Council on Education for Industry and Commerce (N.A.C.E.I.C.) to 'examine the organisation of sandwich courses with a view to using college staff, equipment, and accommodation, and industrial training facilities to the best advantage; and in particular to consider end-on arrangements.' In April 1963, the Minister issued the Report of a special Sub-Committee of the N.A.C.E.I.C. together with Circular 6/63.

2. Association Evidence

The Association submitted written evidence (attached as an Appendix to this Memorandum) which was generally opposed to 'end-on' courses on the grounds that the introduction of these courses was likely to be detrimental to the education of the students and the conditions of work of teachers. Further, the Association's representatives in oral evidence attached particular stress to their hope that the N.A.C.E.I.C. Sub-Committee would not make recommendations which would reduce the flexibility now prevailing, allowing colleges to seek the best form of organisation for sandwich courses.

3. Comments on the Circular and Report

The Association is glad to see that prominence and importance is given in the report of the Sub-Committee to the views which we expressed. We note that the Sub-Committee found no evidence of great demand for end-on courses, nor evidence that the development of end-on courses would necessarily bring a substantial improvement in the provision of industrial training.

Further, we note the limited and conditional recommendations of the Sub-Committee for the introduction of more end-on courses. In particular, we would draw attention to paragraph 70(f) of the N.A.C.E.I.C. Report:

'(f) As no single pattern of courses has shown itself to be best for all technologies in all circumstances, it is important that colleges should be free to devise and experiment with new patterns. There is a danger that the widespread introduction of end-on courses would reduce the degree of flexibility necessary for this.'

The Sub-Committee limited its encouragement of end-on courses, in paragraph 70(g) to cases where:

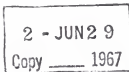

'(i) they are justified by the anticipated student enrolments; (ii) minimum conditions for the economic deployment of staff exist; and (iii) the detailed proposals regarding the courses, e.g., those concerning their length, have been agreed with industry.'

In the Association's view, it would be unjustifiable to introduce end-on courses where these conditions, and the proviso of paragraph 70(f), are not satisfied. Additionally we would not be willing for these courses to be started unless there was a firm guarantee that conditions of work for staff and students were in no way worsened.

We regret that Circular 6/63 appears to give more support to the extension of end-on courses than does the Sub-Committee's report—notably by omitting from the Circular some of the important conditions and reservations made in the report. As an example, there is no mention of this important part of paragraph 63 of the Report:

'... But the end-on arrangement inevitably reduces the degree of flexibility available to a college for devising and experimenting with new patterns, and it would in our view be undesirable that any college should, at any rate for the time being, adopt the arrangement for such a high proportion of its sandwich work that it removed its freedom to experiment with other sandwich patterns and to benefit from a study of the results achieved by such experiments.'
